--Transcript of statement from ROK Consulting on behalf of Shannon Smith—

Credibility and accountability are reflected in actions. Anyone evaluating these allegations should consider Revival's documented history, Mr. Bonds' own public statements, and the circumstances of his departure.

After weeks of avoiding conversations about his responsibilities, Mr. Bonds removed Revival memorabilia on its sixth anniversary and resigned by text at approximately 1 a.m. the following morning. When Ms. Smith requested a conversation, Mr. Bonds had his attorney respond instead. He disclaims ownership, sues a company in which his father is an owner, and blames Ms. Smith for day-to-day management that was his sole professional responsibility.

His departure coincided with his pursuit of a lucrative opportunity closely mirroring Revival's business model, apparently offering less responsibility. Yet the prospective employer confirmed in writing that no offer existed and none was planned. The timing and contradictions raise serious questions about Mr. Bonds' credibility, judgment, and accountability.

Ms. Smith will vigorously defend against these allegations and pursue all appropriate claims against all proper parties to protect Revival and its continued success.
